Geocaching is a unique outdoor adventure that literally involves many of the same activities the cacher does every day. All caches are hidden by the cacher and contain a logbook and coordinates. These points are usually recorded by GPS or other means. The cache logs give a clue as to the kind of information that would be on a log. Geocaching is the most popular outdoor activity in the world. And of course the leading cause of death and dismemberment is along the trails created by the geocaching community. Hide and go Geocaching was the first GPS-based competitive outdoor activity to be developed. Originally, the emphasis was on trail-blazing which would earn points for the success, along with encouragement for the entire group. However, this quickly became less exciting than actually searching and finding the cache. In fact, everyone starting out is guaranteed some sort of activity or game which involves more than just searching. Geocaching has its detractors. Some say it is too expensive, that it is only for girls, that it is too competitive, that it is too stressful. These are all false, but people will say whatever makes them feel good. However, the one thing that really brings a bad rap to geocaching is that it is truly addictive. The more you do, the more you want to do. The more you learn, the more you want to learn. Whether you are a first timer or an experienced geocacher, there is a little something to learn for everybody. Even experienced geocachers often find a little new thing they wanted to learn. The thing about geocaching is that it offers a great balance of outdoor exploration and relaxation. This can be a great way to unwind at the end of the day, and, in more ways than one. Over the years, geocaching has grown immensely. Geocaches have become more interesting and entertaining. Along with this growth, the amount of geocaching-related websites has also grown. Now we have geocaching forums, blogs, podcasts, videos, games, and, of course, geocaching websites. Finally, the search engines are getting in on the action. Google is the leader in this digital age. Before Google, people had to type the word "geocaching" into a search engine. They were doing research to find something related to geocaching. They were looking for information on their own geocache. Now, they use a particular search engine to find
